Shipping Dimensions*

- All major shipping carriers announced in January 2017 plans to begin calculating shipping rates using dimensional weight
- Dimensional weight is different from actual weight, and is more representative of the amount of truck space a package actually occupies
- The dimensional weight of a package can be calculated by measuring its dimensions in inches (length, width, height) and plugging them in to the following formula:

(Length x Width x Height)/166 = Dimensional Weight (in pounds)

- This is the dimensions of the box a product will typically ship in, not the product itself
- Please note: the dimensional weight of a product is most accurate when shipping single-item packages but cannot accurately predict the dimensional weight of multiple items shipping together, nor does it account for packing material or free accessories when included
- Some of our smaller items may meet the weight/size restrictions to ship via USPS
- Below is a list of our larger items shipping FedEx Ground and/or FedEx Freight:
